Introduction

PlaceEconomics and our companion firm, Heritage Strategies International, work at the intersection of historic resources and economics. To inform our own research, but also to provide insights to those working in the field of heritage conservation, we periodically conduct online surveys which we call PresPolls.

This poll asked about preservation-related books in thirteen categories. PlaceEconomics colleagues suggested books within each category to constitute the survey, but for every question there was also an opportunity for survey respondents to suggest books they felt should be included in that category. Respondents were asked to rate the books on the following scale: 1 = Poor; 2 = Fair; 3 = Good; 4 = Very Good; 5 = Excellent. The option "I don't know this book" was the alternative choice.

There was also a fourteenth, open-ended question for survey respondents to identify books they felt should be in a preservation library. Your bookshelf needs to be large, as nearly 100 additional books were recommended.

The survey was open from June 7 through June 11, 2021. Just short of 100 responses were received. It is important to understand this is not a random survey of the general population. The vast majority of both our Facebook friends and our mailing lists have at least an interest in and are often vocal advocates for historic preservation and many are professionally involved in the fields of historic preservation and heritage conservation.

The PlaceEconomics crew also took the opportunity to identify our book choice in each of the areas. Those colleagues include Katlyn Cotton, Director of Marketing and Design; Alyssa Frystak, Director of Research and Data Analytics; Starr Herr-Cardillo, Content Writer; Donovan Rypkema, Principal; and Rodney Swink, Senior Associate for Planning and Development. Consider these choices similar to the "Staff Recommends" list at your local bookstore.

These surveys are conducted using Survey Monkey, a link to which is provided through our direct mail list and through social media. The link to the survey was shared via our three Facebook pages (PlaceEconomics, Heritage Strategies International, and Donovan Rypkema) as well as on the "Historic Preservation Professionals" Facebook page, a private group with approximately 5,400 members, and the National Trust's Preservation Forum. Additionally, we sent a link to the survey to our domestic and international mailing lists of more than 6,000.

Finally, four things became apparent in reading the results of this survey. First, there were several titles suggested by survey respondents that once we saw them, we said, "of course we should have listed that book." Second, we obviously should have had an "architectural history" section. I don't know how we missed that. Third, although as noted, most of these respondents are self-described preservationists, there are a wide variety of interests within the field. These interests range from the conservation of materials to architectural history, to social anthropology, to urban planning, to racial equity. The richness of the field of historic preservation is enhanced by the diversity and complexity of the issues within the field. Fourth, it is clearly evident that the world of historic preservation has moved far beyond just thinking about buildings to a focus on the people who built, live and work in, and are affected by the heritage context of their communities.

Key Findings

The five best known books were:

- A Field Guide to American Houses, McAlester
- The Death and Life of Great American Cities, Jacobs
- Devil in the White City, Larson
- Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil, Berendt
- With Heritage So Rich, Rains

The six highest rated books were:

- The Color of Law, Rothstein
- The Death and Life of Great American Cities, Jacobs
- A Terrible Thing to Waste: Environmental Racism and Its Assault on the American Mind, Washington
- A Field Guide to American Houses, McAlester
- Building the Dream: A Social History of Housing in America, Wright
- The Power of Place, Hayden

Six rather than five were included as "highest rated" in that A Terrible Thing to Waste earned the third highest score, but the sample was quite small as almost 90% of respondents were unfamiliar with the book.

It should be noted that the difference between the Highest Rated and the next highest in any given category were often so small as to be statistically insignificant. But there was a general pattern that the better a book was known the higher it scored.

Most frequently added by respondents (whether or not it was on one of our lists)

- The Color of Law, Rothstein
- Keeping Time: The History and Theory of Preservation in America, Murtaugh
- A Richer Heritage: Historic Preservation in the Twenty-First Century, Stipe

There may be an opportunity for more books in the interrelated "Historic as Green Building" and "Historic Preservation as Sustainable Development" categories in that no respondents to the survey suggested additional books in those questions.

However well-read we think we are and however full our bookcases, there is an abundance of riches of preservation books yet to be discovered.

Question 4 – Likely to Rile You Up

You know when you're reading a book that's so eye-opening, so full of useful stats and tantalizing information that you find yourself wiggling in your seat and pacing around your house reading it? We're looking for the kind of book that makes you feel ready to get to work solving the world's problems, or makes you want to share each line with your pets, your partners, or even complete strangers so you can say "See?! See how this makes so much sense?!"

Best known: The Geography of Nowhere

Question 5 – Incognito Preservation Book

Sometimes, labels can really get in the way. Few people will read a preservation book if they don't think they're interested in preservation and plenty of books, movies, and music are about preservation-related themes like place, collective history, and identity. What great reads are really preservation reads in disguise? Looking for fiction, memoirs, essays, short story collections and the like.

Conclusion

Some have argued that historic preservation is not a distinct field of scholarship nor a separate area of professional practice. Rather it should be seen as simply a subset of architecture or urban planning or cultural anthropology or history.

We believe that the depth and breadth of the writings on historic preservation amply demonstrate preservation's legitimacy as a discrete professional and academic sphere of activity. The cross-sectoral interests and undertakings of preservationists position the field as complementary to, not subordinate to a wide range of professional, academic, technical, cultural, and political activities.

The results of the PresPoll provide ample opportunities to identify a new (to us) books to explore, perhaps beyond our current focus, but within the field of preservation. Knowing more about the principles, practices, and challenges in other areas of preservation cannot help but make us better within our own realms.

The diversity of interest areas, perspectives, scholarship, and opportunities in historic preservation make it an interesting and ever-evolving field within which we individually have the ongoing opportunity to grow. A book or two from these lists can help us do that.
